Acting executive director of the campaign, Carol Kidd, outlined the training is to help candidates understand the specifics of being elected and improve their chances of being elected effectively by implementing strategies to increase their chances of winning.

The workshops were held at the Australian National University and focus on issues including party policies, electoral reform, and the role of women in politics. The workshop was led by women who have been elected to Parliament, providing insights and advice on how to run successful campaigns.

The workshops were aimed at increasing the participation of women in politics and were designed to empower them with the knowledge and skills needed to run successful campaigns.

The workshops included sessions on campaign planning, fundraising, and media strategy. Participants had the opportunity to network with other women who have been involved in politics, providing a valuable opportunity to learn from their experiences.

The message was clear: women have a vital role to play in politics and with the right skills and resources, they can be successful candidates and officeholders.
